Welcome to the PhD Day: A Space for Growth, Dialogue and Connection!

Today's PhD Day is more than a training event—it's a shared moment of intergenerational dialogue and the free circulation of ideas. As doctoral researchers, we stand at the intersection of knowledge production and personal transformation, navigating a complex but rewarding academic journey. This event brings together early-stage PhD candidates, more advanced colleagues, and senior researchers to foster meaningful exchanges, strengthen academic networks, and provide a space for mutual inspiration.

Understanding the PhD lifecycle is key to supporting academic and professional development:

- In the first year, the focus is on exploring and narrowing the research focus, framing your questions, and laying a strong methodological foundation. It's a time of orientation and critical questioning.
- The second year is often a phase of immersion—delving deep into the fieldwork, refining research methods, and developing the PhD's identity as a researcher through direct engagement with data and scholarly literature.
- The third year is the moment to articulate research findings through writing and publishing, while also looking ahead to the next steps, whether in academia, research, or beyond.

Each of these phases brings unique challenges and learning opportunities. Through workshops, thematic tables, and open conversations, this day offers the tools and connections to help you navigate this path with confidence.

Let today be a reminder that research is not a solitary act but a collaborative journey, enriched by dialogue across disciplines, career stages, and institutions.
